My garage studio was born of necessity and has evolved and improved over the last four years.

It started as just a wheel tucked into a crowded garage during the pandemic and has expanded slowly to make room for kiln, homemade sink, work table and shelving. As a working commercial photographer and mom to two school-age kids, having a home studio was key to actually being able to work. I can be found in the garage most nights!

I'm excited to share my lessons learned with those who might think they don't have enough space for home studio. My work is wheel-thrown and hand-built, and in my small space I've managed to turn out production work for Uncommon Goods, as well as regular commissions from Global Table in Soho and craft shows.
